Make sure that your English resume is not simply a translation of your Chinese version because foreign companies have different expectations. Here are some keys to a successful resume. Firstly don't just list the facts one by one. Your resume is expected to stand out of the piles. Highlight the major points by putting them centered bold and in large type. Secondly make it well arranged. Foreign employers are more interested in job skills than education history. So think about what skills or experience you have that the job requires. If you don't have any career experience list what specific applicable skills you learned in your class. Thirdly use precise strong words. Instead of "be good at computer" you can use "professional experience of Microsoft Word Excel and Photoshop". Check it carefully and make sure it doesn't have any spelling and grammatical mistakes. If you stick to the rules mentioned above your resume does capture the attention of the employer!
