Abstract

Intergenerational upbringing is a traditional way of family education in China. With the rapid growth of the urban economy, more and more rural parents leave their hometown to seek development in the city, leaving their children at home to live with their grandparents, which results in a sharp increase in the number of rural families who are separated from their parents. The influence of this family parenting style has also attracted extensive attention from the society. In this study, grandparents in parenting families were taken as the research object, and questionnaire survey was mainly adopted. Through investigation and analysis, it is learned that the grandparents' age, occupation, parenting concept and educational background have a corresponding impact on the growth of children. This research starts from the influence of the rural intergenerational education on the development of children, and puts forward some Suggestions, mainly: the grandparents should change the traditional educational concept, improve the level of education; Parents and grandparents should communicate in a timely manner to reach a consensus; Co-breeding of homes; Parents should learn to listen to their children's aspirations, more accompany children; The government should increase the input to the rural funds and develop the rural economy. With the help of the power of the media, increase the exposure to the education of rural intergenerational.
